

Nuclear Cattle

A Story of Sacrifice after the Fukushima Disaster

A group of farmers from Fukushima's nuclear exclusion zone defy the government by keeping their radiation-affected cows alive.

After 2011's Fukushima Daiichi nuclear power plant disaster, residents within a 20km radius of the facility were forced to evacuate their homes, leaving behind their livelihoods and possessions.

Nuclear Cattle follows six farmers who defied government orders to euthanize livestock and abandon the radiation zone. With no hope of economic return, they continued feeding their cows out of love, ultimately allowing researchers to conduct a pioneering study of the effects of radiation on large mammals.

As Japan comes to grips with its nuclear past, present and future, a rebellion full of heart in a small farming community trying to rebuild after catastrophe has led to some optimism but mostly heartbreak.
